A freshman's guide to UT

Dear freshman,

I hope this column finds you in good health since over the course of this next year, you will never feel as good as you do now. That's okay, though; in fact, it is actually a good thing. The goal of freshman year is to feel significantly worse in May than you do right now — it means you lived. With that in mind, I've compiled a few ideas that are meant to maximize your time here and ensure a wholesome experience.

First off, did you get a sweet new TV to hook up to your Xbox 360? Have you set up a Skype account so you can talk to all your friends from high school? Has Starcraft II taken up the last two weeks of your life? Great, now turn it off — all of it. This is the most important rule, the one on which all others is founded upon: Spend as little time in your dorm room as possible. UT is a huge campus, and the only way to avoid being a number is to go out and explore. Meet new people, join a club or hang out at Gregory Gym. It doesn't really matter if you actually do anything in the club or at the gym, just go. Dorm rooms suck, and if you are really that concerned with the sweet set-up in your room, you would be better off saving your tuition money, living at home and going to community college.

Secondly, and this is also in the spectrum of meeting new people, do not get a girlfriend or boyfriend two weeks into the first semester. It is tempting, I know. You're away from mom and dad now and the allure of getting a significant other and playing grown up is strong, but do not do it. For starters, you are living free now — embrace it. The first semester is all about exploration and meeting new people, two things that happen less frequently when you're planning movie night with your boyfriend. The odds are that you will have rushed into that relationship to begin with and it probably won't last the semester, let alone the year. When that's over, you'll be single and ready to mingle, only nobody will know you because all you've done for the last three months is hang out with your now-ex.

Have fun with being independent for the first time in your life by not settling down too quickly. Find a guy or gal you like? Sweet, good for you, but don't rush it. See how things go and, if in January things are still working out, then think about the next step. Or not. You're in college after all, where education is as much about what takes place outside the classroom as it does inside one.

Which brings me to my next rule: For the love of God, do not spend all your time in the library. I get it, grades are important. That goes without saying. That starts with going to class and then studying. But if you spend all your time studying, you're missing the point of college. It is about the education of a person and that includes all the stuff that comes with being independent for the first time. If grades are all you're concerned about, stay home and take online courses. You are in Austin, the greatest city in America. Embrace it. Go out and explore. Hit up Sixth Street. Go walk around Mount Bonnell. Make friends with somebody who has a boat and go out on Lake Austin. Just don't become a drone, wasting the best four years of your prime in the PCL.

My friend has this saying he picked up from teammates at Notre Dame: Whenever someone is dragging or being a real party pooper, he will hit them in the arm and ask, “Are you f*^@ing sleeping?!” It usually works to wake up anyone who was f*^@ing sleeping, and that's a good thing. Do not f*^@ing sleep, ever. There is plenty of time to sleep when you're old, but now is not that time. You are young — your immune system is strong — so stay up until the sun rises because there will soon be a day, four years from now, when you will be waking up before the sun rises and going to work. So don't sleep, not now, when you have so much to learn and so many new people to meet. Oh, but naps are OK. In fact, take frequent catnaps because they're the only thing that will keep you alive.

I hope these words find you in good health and may your health deteriorate during the next nine months. Because if you are as healthy in May as you are now, you've wasted a year of your youth and that would be a shame.

Rienstra is a journalism junior.

UT Athletics reveals name, logo for new 'Longhorn Network'

ESPN Senior Vice President Burke Magnus and UT athletics directors DeLoss Dodds and Chris Plonsky announced the name and logo for the 24-hour television network at the Longhorns' annual spring football game during the weekend.

The aptly named Longhorn Network will be dedicated to covering all Texas athletics events, along with a variety of other content, including original series and studio shows, historical programming and academic and cultural happenings.

The network's logo incorporates the traditional Longhorn silhouette on a backdrop of orange and black.

“We plan on bringing great Longhorn content to fans right from the launch, which will drive demand for LHN from viewers, advertisers and affiliates,” said Dave Brown, vice president of programming for ESPN, including the Longhorn Network.

The website LonghornNetwork.com is the broadband companion to the television network and will broadcast live games not offered on TV due to scheduling conflicts. GetLonghornNetwork.com debuted, along with the logo, to serve as a place where fans can get information on how to get the network in time for its August 2011 launch.

“We are the first individual school network and we are looking forward to developing a channel that the University of Texas and Longhorns everywhere can be proud of,” Brown said.

Texas loses ranking as No. 1 party school

By William James
Daily Texan Staff
Originally published April 15

UT has a “work hard, party hard” ethos, but the University no longer holds the Playboy Magazine No. 1 party school title. Playboy’s editors, who considered feedback from readers, students, alumni and campus representatives, ranked UT fifth. They also looked at factors such as male-female ratios on campus, academics, proximity to recreational hot spots and athletic records, according to a statement from the magazine.

Meagan Heeren, a senior engineering major and Alpha Delta Pi sorority member, said she thinks UT’s rank dropped mainly because of UT’s rough football season this past fall. Heeren said her sorority maintained frequent social events this year, and she went to more parties this year than she did before.

“We party hard, but I guess we didn’t party hard enough this year for Playboy,” Heeren said.

April Tieu, a student associate in Student Activities and Leadership Development, said she did not see a significant drop in activities or social events registered on campus, and she blamed the lower ranking on difficult economic times.

“It’s possible we are not ranked first anymore because of the heavy workload students receive at UT or because of financial problems our economy is facing,” Tieu said.

Absolute Texas’s vice president, Amanda Jarman, also said that the social organization held the same events it did last year, and she is not sure what made UT’s ranking drop.

Playboy’s 2011 top party school went to the University of Colorado at Boulder. Editors noted the school is the “home to reefer madness,” housing more than 50 medical marijuana dispensaries.

Every April, more than half of CU’s 24,000 undergraduates participate in the “4/20 smoke-out on school grounds,” according to the magazine. Boulder is also a top beer drinking school, possessing four breweries within its city limits.

Second place went to Pennsylvania State University, followed by Arizona State University and University of Western Ontario, the first Canadian university to make Playboy’s list.

The rankings will be published in Playboy’s May edition, which will also include “the best (and worst) of everything on campus this spring” with categories such as “Best Naked Parties” — Yale University — “Coolest Course” — University of California, Berkeley’s “The Sociology of Seinfeld” — and “Hottest Sorority” — San Diego State’s Alpha Phi.

Allen Otto | Daily Texan Staff

UT has lost its place as Playboy’s No. 1 party school to the University of Colorado at Boulder and now ranks 5th. The decision is based off factors such as male-female ratio and proximity to recreational hot spots.

University gaining widespread social media presence

By Allie Kolečta
Daily Texan Staff
Originally published Jan. 21

Although only about 6,000 people follow UT on Twitter, a website recently ranked UT one of the top-10 most influential college Twitter accounts in the U.S. along with universities like Stanford, Syracuse and Harvard.

Klout.com rated UT 10th out of the top 10 most influential university Twitter feeds earlier this week. The website rates the influence of Twitter feeds on a scale of one to 100 based on 35 factors including number of tweets, retweets and how often tweets are used in Twitter conversations.

UT's Twitter account opened about two and a half years ago, and website administrators have posted about 600 tweets to date, said Nyleva Corley, manager of web and new media in the Office of Public Affairs.

"We were interested in taking advantage of what was a new channel at the time to reach out to students," she said. "We thought they would gravitate to a social media platform like Twitter, and we were interested in experimenting with it."

The account currently has 6,627 followers, and that number is steadily growing, Corley said. The account posts at least one and no more than seven tweets a day.

"It really captures the pulse of what's happening on campus," she said.

The Stanford Twitter page, which topped the Klout.com list, has more than 23,000 followers.

Major news days on campus are the busiest days for UT's Twitter feed, said Samantha Stiles, public affairs specialist and a primary author on UT's account. On Jan. 19, the Twitter account was bustling with activity because UT announced a $300-million contract with ESPN to create a Longhorn TV network, Stiles said.

Twitter administrators posted three tweets with details about the new network between noon and 1:30 p.m.

"We're able to align traditional outlets with social media outlets," she said. "The Twitter account is a great outlet for patting ourselves on the back."

The Twitter account is not linked to UT's Facebook account, but the two work together to keep UT students informed through their social media outlets, she said. Tweets are released at intervals throughout the day to inform followers without spamming them, she said.

"A lot of our tweets are from prospective students that are excited about coming to UT," she said. "I like to tweet a message back to them and say 'Congrats, welcome to the Longhorn family.' A pretty popular hash tag is 'hookem.'"

The Student Government Twitter account and the UT account are not officially affiliated, but the SG account makes an effort to channel the UT account through its Twitter, said SG administrative director Nathan Bunch.

UT's account and student accounts can become primary sources of information in times of crisis, like the Sept. 28 incident when Colton Tooley shot off several rounds with his AK-47 in the Perry-Castaneda Library before taking his own life. Campus and student Twitter accounts helped students inform each other of the situation's status and where to take shelter, said Bunch, who runs SG's Twitter account.

"We're a generation that is often criticized for our use of social media, but that's what helped us keep each other safe," he said. "We're not used to getting information in traditional ways, and social media is a method that the University can take advantage of to get information out there faster."

More than 100 students gave up sleeping in late on Saturday morning to pull aluminum cans, plastic bags and discarded clothes out of Waller Creek.

The Environmental Health and Safety Office and the Texas Natural Science Center came together for the biannual Waller Creek Cleanup.

Waller Creek runs from North Austin, through the city and campus, into Lady Bird Lake downtown. Trash from the streets washes down storm drains and into the creek.

Carin Peterson, the event's coordinator and training and outreach coordinator for the Environmental Health and Safety Office, said the 115 volunteers was an average turnout for the popular event.

"Littering is a big problem in Waller Creek," Peterson said. "What happens is, it's not just Emily and Ethan Doucette play along Waller Creek after a group of volunteers with the Environmental Health Center cleaned up trash on a Saturday last fall.

campus litter that ends up in the creek. Because the creek flows down to Town Lake, we get a lot of trash from beyond campus that comes down."

The groups of volunteers focused on the portion of the creek that starts at Dean Keeton Street and flows down to MLK Boulevard.

"Littering is a huge problem on campus and our department is [a steward] of the creek and it's important to keep the creek clean," Peterson said. "The creek is a place where students, faculty and staff can enjoy themselves and relax. Because it's part of the larger water system in Austin, we want to help keep it clean."

Psychology senior Jose Porras has attended the event twice.

"I feel that in my encounters with volunteer activities around the campus, this has been one of the most rewarding and one of the ones where I feel I make the most direct impact on my campus," Porras said.

He said UT students are not aware about what type of impact littering can have on the environment.

"I feel that you can never have enough awareness or help around the campus — especially one of this size and one with so many students," Porras said.

According to wallercreek.org, animals like the Great Blue Heron and the Roseate Skimmer dragonfly rely on the creek to survive.

"I care about how UT looks and the environment," said accounting senior Sara Shih, who attended Saturday's event. "You always see trash in Waller Creek. It could be so beautiful if we took care of it."

First-year students, transfers may get more time to Q-drop

By Ahsika Sanders
Daily Texan Staff
Originally published April 6

First-year students may gain peace of mind with the option to drop a course after the last class day if the administration accepts a Senate of College Councils resolution.

The University Academic Policies and Procedures' current policy only allows a student to drop courses after the mid-semester mark for non-academic circumstances, such as severe illness or mental stress following a family member's death.

The new resolution will permit first-year students, including transfer students, to drop a course up until the final exam.

Senate of College Councils president-elect Carisa Nietsche said Faculty Council is currently discussing the resolution and will have to approve it before it is implemented.

"It could potentially mean that a student could drop a course after a class has already ended, as long as they haven't completed the coursework," Nietsche said.

She said although the administration has already begun discussing the resolution, implementation will depend on how they prioritize it. The policy may go into effect as soon as the fall semester, she said.

The policy prohibits students from using the exemption after they have completed all of the coursework because it is not meant for students whose final exams will determine whether they will fail the class, said resolution co-author Ashley Adamo.

Radio-television-film junior Rhea Fluker said she could have benefited from the policy as a second-semester transfer student. She said she realized too late that she needed to drop one of her courses or she would fail it.

"At this point, I couldn't handle the course load anymore, but by the time I realized that, there was little I could do to not fail the class. It was the Friday after the Q-drop date," she said.

Fluker said she checked with her advisers and met with her professor multiple times to see if there was any way she could have dropped the class to "salvage" her grade point average, but there were no options.

"If I could have dropped it last minute, I definitely would have benefited because it would have eased the blow to my GPA and stress levels," she said.

The College of Natural Sciences, the School of Architecture and the School of Nursing are currently the only schools with the one-time exemption policy in place, and each has their own implementation guidelines.

The one-time exemption policy could be especially beneficial for first- or second-year students in a five-year program such as the one at the School of Architecture, said Jeanne Crawford, assistant dean for the school's undergraduate programs.

"There are those times when something is going on in the student's life, and they might not be aware of drop policies or they forget them, so we always allow them that one exemption during their time at UT," Crawford said. "I would say for those students, it certainly helps when it comes down to dropping or receiving an 'F'."

Students dug in their pockets to help support the Student Emergency Fund at the first-ever Spring into Giving campaign.

Students Hooked on Texas, a group devoted to community service and fundraising for UT, sponsored the full-day event on Gregory Plaza on Wednesday to raise money for the Student Emergency Fund. The cause brought together student volunteers from several University colleges and philanthropic societies.

The fund helps students stay on track academically in times of crisis, said Christa Lopez, the coordinator of Student Emergency Services in the Office of the Dean of Students, which sponsors the fund. "We help students sustain their progress at UT," Lopez said. "Sometimes, without these funds, the students would have to leave the University, delaying their education a semester or a year. We help them make it to their graduation on time."

The Student Emergency Fund, which started 10 years ago, is available to any UT student facing a "temporary financial hardship resulting from an emergency situation," according to the Dean of Students website, which is also where students apply for aid. On average, amounts given range from $25-$150 and have previously helped students pay for hardships, including medical tests and treatments and plane tickets to attend an immediate family member's funeral.

Party on the Plaza, the Hearts of Texas, Texas Parents, in addition to yesterday's event, provide most of the donations to the fund, but anyone can contribute by going to the Dean of Students website. All of the money raised goes toward students who apply for financial help.

"There's such a direct, immediate benefit with the Emergency Fund, as every dollar raised goes to help someone experiencing a personal crisis," said Julie Lucas, the assistant director of Students Hooked on Texas.

For this year's Spring into Giving campaign, a group of five alumni have pledged to match student donations dollar-for-dollar by each donating up to $5,000, Lucas said. They will renew this pledge annually for the next four years. Lucas said they won't know the total amount raised this year until Friday.

"[With $3,000-$4,000 currently in the fund] and the 50,000 students at UT, we obviously can't help everyone," Lopez said. "So for students that may be OK financially, we encourage them to give back to their friend who needs a little help or their classmate who is homeless and living on the street. Even if someone doesn't think that giving a dollar will help, that dollar becomes two. And you never know who or how you are helping."

Students interested in applying for a grant from the Emergency Fund can find the application on the Office of the Dean of Students website. The application must be accompanied by sufficient documentation of financial hardship.

"In times of crisis, it's already so stressful, and to know that there is some backup from the University takes some of that pressure off," said applied learning and development freshman Sumayya Pirbhai, who volunteered at the event.

At UT, there's an organization to fit any student's interest

Stephanie Bathurst | Longhorn Life Staff
Senior Destinee Hodge served as co-chair of the 2011 Forty Acres Fest. She has been involved in 12 organizations as a Longhorn.

By Destinee Hodge

Originally published March 25 in Longhorn Life, an advertising special edition of The Daily Texan

Our University sits on more than 400 acres of land and is home to more than 50,000 students who make up nearly 1,500 active student organizations on campus. Quite understandably, it is very easy to get lost in the crowd.

I came to UT in 2008 as a transfer student from the British Virgin Islands, and I must admit that I was incredibly overwhelmed by the vastness of the campus and the number of people I had to dodge as I navigated my way around. I needed to find a way to connect and somehow feel like part of a community. After three years of making posters, going to meetings and planning events, I've been involved in 12 organizations, all of which have enhanced my overall experience here.

Getting involved on campus is vital to getting to know this University, meeting people and feeling connected. When you attend a college this large, there is really nothing better than finding a group of people with whom you share common interests. An added benefit is that it looks great on your resume to have committed to an organization for significant periods during your college career.

If you are new to the on-campus involvement scene, I suggest two things to consider when deciding what organizations to join. First, think about what you like to do and then see if there's a group that shares your interest.

And at UT, chances are you will find one. For example, if you like community service, you can join the Longhorn Unit of Volunteering, or if you love animals, you can join Students Against Cruelty to Animals. You are certainly more likely to stick with a group that you actually want to be in. As a point of reference, one of the first groups I joined at UT was the Caribbean Students Association. They could obviously provide me with the sense of community that I really needed.

Second, I suggest branching out to an organization that you may not have considered joining. It is really easy to spend your four (or more) years at UT staying in your comfort zone. However, it would completely defeat the purpose of college if you never try anything new. Maybe go to the Malaysian Student Association and learn something about that culture, or check out some moves at Texas Taekwondo. You'd be surprised what you can learn to love.

If you are still unsure about which organization or group to join, I would also suggest attending the University-wide Forty Acres Fest event for which I am this year's co-chair.

This year's Forty Acres Fest is next week and is one of the largest student-run events on campus. While the event ends with a huge concert featuring Big Boi, one of the main highlights will be the more than 200 student organizations on site to showcase what they're all about. The event also features a ton of free entertainment. I would stop by the Main Mall on April 2 to see which group is waiting to welcome you.

For more information about which student group is best for you, visit the Office of the Dean of Students while you're on campus, at the Student Services Building room 4.104, or online, at deanofstudents.utexas.edu/sald/studentorgs/index.php.

Flawn center continues 4th floor upgrades

By Ahsika Sanders
Daily Texan Staff
Originally published Dec. 1, 2010

Construction has left campus walkways and entire floors of the Flawn Academic Center blocked off since summer 2009, and officials say the disruptions will not end until next July.

A construction crew is in the process of upgrading fire alarm and communication systems, as well as renovating the third and fourth floors to make room for new office space.

Between 25 and 40 construction workers are on site five days a week and at night to minimize noise and disruptions, said Bob Rawski, regional program manager for the UT System. He said there were some fire and safety improvements that they needed to make to bring the building up to code.

"The fire sprinklers, for instance, really dramatically improve the building for the occupants," he said. "That was one of the drivers of the project and the other was to renovate those floors to make them more efficient for use."

According to the University's construction advisory website, the project was initially slotted for completion in winter 2011.

The FAC is one of several buildings undergoing construction as part of an overall plan to update and improve the UT campus.

Rawski said much of the renovated space will be used to house several new vice presidents' offices.

Patricia Clubb, vice president for University Operations, said factors such as school needs, faculty recruitment and student population are all taken into account to determine the timing of construction.

"Big capital projects take years to materialize," she said. "Everything gets factored in so there's no one thing that will put one project in front of another one."

Clubb said small projects all over campus, such as the Tower, the communication, liberal arts and Hackerman buildings and the stadium are all individually funded.

"Every project has a funding profile, and there can be many different sources of funding that go into one project and each of them is built," Clubb said.

The $22 million total cost for the FAC renovations came from three different sources, said Daniel Tovar, project manager for the FAC construction site. He said $20 million of the project's funding came from interest on local funds and money distributed to the University but not designated for educational use.

The third floor of the FAC recently reopened to the public, but construction continues with renovation on the fourth floor.

Campus renovations, such as the one at the Flawn Academic Center, have restricted walkways students frequently use.

How to get TICKETS

The Longhorn football team emerges onto the field at Darrell K Royal-Texas Memorial Stadium for the 2010 season’s game against Baylor. Andrew Torrey | Daily Texan Staff

The first step in getting access to those all-important UT games is to purchase a Longhorn All-Sports Package when you first register for classes. If you do not purchase it then, you may buy one at the stadium’s box office. This sports package costs $80 for the school year and will get you into all games as long as there is still space available (with the exception of football and basketball).

Football

A student-reserved-seat season ticket costs $60 in addition to the price of the LASP. There are only a limited number of season tickets available to students. Student-reserved-seat season tickets are located in the east side lower deck, east side upper deck and north end zone of the stadium. Ticket orders are filled according to the priority system. One guest season ticket may be purchased at full price adjacent to the student season ticket. Tickets may be purchased at TexasBoxOffice.com.

Students with an LASP who do not have tickets can get into home games via the football ticket draw. The draw is a per-game distribution of tickets at the Athletics Ticket Office for football games. As long as seats are available, each LASP holder may draw a ticket upon presentation of a valid LASP ID. No guest tickets will be available for purchase unless tickets remain after the designated draw period.

Oklahoma and Away Games: Only those students who purchase both the LASP and the student season ticket are eligible to receive tickets for the OU game and other high demand away games, initially. LASP student season ticket holders have the first opportunity to purchase Texas-OU tickets at full price through the student season ticket order process. For other high demand away games LASP holders who do not purchase the student season ticket will only be eligible to purchase tickets to these games if tickets remain after student season ticket holder requests are processed.

Basketball

Students may purchase an O-Zone pass for basketball games that gives them guaranteed seats. This can be purchased on top of an LASP. Students with an LASP can get into the games for free as long as there are spots available. Some big games may have a draw ahead of time.

Baseball • Softball • Volleyball • Soccer • Tennis

As long as seats are available, these sports are free for students who have an LASP and who present a valid UT ID upon admittance.

Cross Country • Golf • Rowing • Swimming & Diving • Track & Field

Regular season events are free and open to the public.

Safety forums, UT event raise awareness for Bike Month

By William James
Daily Texan Staff
Originally published May 4

Austin drivers could see some relief from usually hectic traffic throughout May as citizens participate in National Bike Month. To kick off the month, UT Parking and Transportation Services is hosting Bike to UT Day today, where breakfast will be available at five guard kiosks to encourage participants. To ensure a smooth month, the Center for Sustainable Development held a forum about bicycling on campus Tuesday afternoon, where six panelists discussed how education, safety and infrastructure improvements can make bicycling on campus a better experience for everyone. An audience of 30 spoke about problems bicycle riders face when riding on campus. Alan Bush, a graduate student in community and regional planning, said three separate groups have to work together to make UT's transportation systems run smoothly: bicyclists, pedestrians and automobile drivers. "A solution can be found [to ease transit problems]," he said. "If we create a study to find out how much of the problem deals with lack of drivers' education or a poor infrastructure, then we can focus on those issues and see if new laws should be made for bikers."

Many of the panelists, including Eileen Schaubert, a Mellow Johnny's community outreach coordinator, said UT should offer cycling education during freshman orientation to familiarize students with accessible routes and following the road rules on campus. "The UT administration does not take cycling seriously enough because it is not fixed in the campus's infrastructure," Schaubert said. Tom Wald, executive director of the League of Bicycling Voters, said the University needs to focus more attention on bicyclists to ensure their safety by increasing cycling education. "Bicycling is not considered a very accepted, core part of how the administration considers students getting to school," Wald said. "Between students and the University, millions of dollars could be saved if people rode their bikes instead of driving." Some universities around the country, including the University of California, Irvine, started using bike-sharing systems, a program similar to car2go, to decrease automobile transportation City Council member Chris Riley said the city is likely to get a bike-sharing system within the next couple of years, which would take more cars off the streets. Desiree French, a panelist and Orange Bike Project coordinator, said once the city gets the bike-sharing system, UT might also consider such a system. French said students should write a proposal to the UT Green Fund committee to start a bike-sharing program. The Green Fund allots money to members of the University for environmental and sustainability projects.

BIKES ON CAMPUS

Bringing your bicycle with you this fall? There are a few things you should know about having your bike on campus:

- Registering it: UT's Parking and Transportation Services department now requires that everyone with bikes on campus register them. So, put that on your to-do list.
- The Orange Bike Project: A product of the Campus Environmental Center, the program has access to used bikes, tools and also provides a space to work on bikes. Students can even "check out" bicycles for the semester.
- The Kickstand: Located on Speedway Plaza, this is the University's new bike hub, your one-stop shop for helmets, locks and other bicycle gear.

For more information about biking to, from and on campus, visit utexas.edu/parking/transportation/biking/.

UT law students can earn a dual law degree from the UT School of Law and from the Instituto Tecnológico Autónomo de México in Mexico City through a new program currently accepting applications. Law school Dean Lawrence Sager and Jorge Cerdio, dean of the Department of Law at the Institute, spent several years developing the program, which aims to increase the number of lawyers who are able to practice in both countries. "In a globalized world, there are more and more legal transactions and interactions," said UT Law Professor Ariel Dulitzky. "Establishing these types of programs is an idea to prepare first-rate lawyers, both in Mexican law and U.S. law." The deans also decided to create the program as a way to strengthen ties between Texas and Mexico. "We don't only share the border, but we share a common heritage, history, traditions," Dulitzky said. "There are a lot of economic interactions between Texas and Mexico, and many Texan law firms have partners or offices in Mexico, so it was very easy for us to make that connection." The program will allow participating students to earn their Juris Doctor degree from UT and the Mexican equivalent, a Licenciatura en Derecho, from the Institute. Once students receive both degrees, they will be eligible to sit for the bar exam in the U.S. and apply for a license to practice law in Mexico. It is the first program that links a top-tier U.S. law school to one in a Latin American country. "I really think it's a terrific opportunity for students in the program, as well as for citizens in the country, because we'll be able to achieve greater levels of collaboration," said Assistant Law School Dean Kirston Fortune. Students can apply for the program now, and each school will begin offering coursework for students from the other in fall 2012. Students who begin at UT must complete two years at UT and four semesters at the Institute, while students who begin at the Institute must complete four years at the Institute and two years at UT.

Second-year law student Aparna Tal-luri said although she will not apply to the program, it is a great opportunity for students to learn more about other cultures and thereby further improve their knowledge of the law. "Because business is crossing national borders, our legal system has to, as well," she said "If you're dealing with policies abroad, you need to be well aware of their policies and law[s] in order to be the best lawyer you can be for your client."

Meet Austin, your new city

Shannon Kintner | Daily Texan Staff

The state Capitol Building sits in downtown Austin. With more than 50,000 students at UT, the city is home to hundreds of thousands of young people. It's also named the "Live Music Capital of the World."

Census data reveal increased diversity, young people in Texas Capitol

Austin is growing more diverse, and more students are migrating to the University area, said a city demographer.

Ryan Robinson, a city demographer, analyzed the 2010 census figures and presented his findings to a group of about 60 people on campus Thursday.

Austin's total population is now more than 790,000, according to the census. Austin is the 14th-largest city in the country, one spot up from where it ranked in 2000.

International immigration played a major part in the city's population boom. The city's white population is aging and remaining stagnant, while the Hispanic population is surging. Fifty-seven percent of the city's population is now Hispanic, and one in two children born in Austin is Hispanic.

"Even when jobs were falling, international immigration continued to grow," Robinson said. "Job creation, quality of life relative to competing cities and an extreme sense of [home] are some other things that might have sparked a population growth."

Robinson said he also found an increase in people living around the University because students moved from the East Riverside area to the West Campus area.

"If UT wasn't doing as well as it was today, the population in West Campus wouldn't be as prominent as it is today," Robinson said.

The black population in the main parts of the city went down. Robinson said he noticed an increase in the black population in Austin suburbs, which may suggest that an increased number of black residents are moving from the city to surrounding areas.

The census also showed how different racial groups inhabited different parts of Austin and which parts were the wealthiest. Slowly, East Austin is losing its previously black majority, while West Austin remains predominantly white, and North Austin is seeing a more concentrated group of Hispanics.

"I find this information very enlightening with regard to how the city is becoming more divided and look forward to seeing how the city will respond to the results," said Drew Blair, a retired economics professor from St. Edwards University.

New Student Activity Center opens doors

By Ahsika Sanders

The product of years of planning will debut today with the opening of the Student Activity Center.

The $68 million building features a black box theater, auditorium, study lounges, meeting rooms, dance halls and new food options, including a Taco Cabana and Zen.

Former Student Government Vice President Marcus Cisneros, who was in office in 2006-07 when students passed a referendum to add the $65-per-semester tuition increase that will pay for the center, said it was important that the center reflect what students wanted.

"We asked 'What do you want, what do you like, and what do you need?' And we tried to put that together to make the best building possible," said Cisneros, who was on the planning committee.

The students involved in the planning process worked with the Campus Environmental Center and the Students with Disabilities Agency to make sure the building was both environmentally sound and easily accessible to all students.

"We worked with students with disabilities to make sure that every space was accessible by wheelchair and accommodating to students with different needs," Cisneros said. "We also wanted our building to have elements of sustainability and efficient energy usage."

The center is held to high environmental standards with flower gardens and the cisterns to collect water and reduce the building's wasted resources. The University is seeking a silver LEED certification for the building, which would indicate high levels of efficiency and sustainability, said UT sustainability director Jim Walker.

Cisneros said perhaps the most important element of the center was making it activity-driven with expanded facilities.

"Students who didn't have a space to conduct certain dance practices, for example, now have a space to do that," he said.

SAC director Crystal King said she hopes students embrace the center as a special place and make it their own.

Student Government President Scott Parks said the center's many new features and convenient location will soon make it a new high traffic area. SG offices are moving from the Student Services Building to the SAC this month.

"I think that the Student Activity Center will be a really nice compliment to the Union that we already have," he said. "It will be a more vibrant, flexible space for all different kinds of student groups to meet and hang out."

In addition to SG, the center is now home to the Office of the Dean of Students, the Multicultural Information Center and the Gender and Sexuality Center, among other organizations' offices.

UT President William Powers Jr. and other Longhorns cut the ribbon outside the Student Activity Center for its grand opening in February.

A student takes advantage of the free climbing wall in Gregory Gymnasium as a part of RecSports' celebration of Love Your Body Week. Gregory offered free classes and events for National Recreational Sports & Fitness Day.

RecSports celebrates 'fitness week' with free events, programs

Gregory Gym and the recreational sports center offered free classes Wednesday to celebrate National Recreational Sports & Fitness Day.

Sarah Jordan, who oversees group exercise programs at Gregory Gym, said the day's events were part of Love Your Body Week.

"RecSports partners with UT Health Services this week to promote positive body image and fun fitness," Jordan said.

In addition to free TeXercise and cycling classes all day long, there were 15-minute class demonstrations ranging from Zumba dance to fencing.

The gym also offered free rock climbing, which staff members said had a great turnout. Corporate communications senior Alex Rios came to the rock wall as part of the national fitness day.

"I've never climbed before, and I saw a sign that said there was free climbing from 2 to 5 p.m. for national fitness day so I wanted to check it out, try it," he said.

In an industry where designs are predominately geared towards women, two senior designers broke the mold with outstanding menswear collections at the 2011 textiles and apparel senior fashion show, “Innovation,” on Thursday night at the Frank Erwin Center. Despite having no formal training in menswear from College of Natural Sciences, designers Colton Gerard and Christopher Pham swept the awards with their well-made and sophisticatedly styled collections.

A packed Erwin Center watched and applauded as 23 textiles and apparel senior fashion designers debuted more than 100 looks. Following the runway show, superlative awards were distributed to deserving students by panelists which included fashion designers, writers, boutique owners and experts alike.

The Best Collection award went to Gerard. The collection, titled “Heritage,” was well received by the audience, especially by Stephen MacMillian Moser, fashion icon and Austin Chronicle columnist, who gave Gerard a standing ovation. His looks featured rugged, detailed jackets which incorporated many natural elements including rabbit fur, distressed leather and toggles made from deer antlers.

Honorable mention for Best Collection was awarded to Pham. Though his all-American adaptation of aristocratic blue bloods was not as original, Pham’s sophistication and taste shone through the garments. The pieces also resonate with the personality of Ralph Lauren, for whom Pham interned last summer.

Among other sponsors, the University Co-op sponsored the event and is selling three designers’ garments in their store. Pham, Elise Romero and Megan Mehl won the Most Marketable and Creative award, and their dresses will be sold in the Co-op starting today. Awards were also presented to Sophia Al-Banna, Angela Saenz, Kalgari Ferris and Heidi Mashaka for being the most creative.

Other standouts of the evening included an impeccably constructed line of monochromatic silks and androgynous lines from Jessica Bird and three adaptations of delicate white pieces by Al-Banna.

By far one of the best garments that walked the runway was Bird’s leather creme jacket, which surpasses the workmanship of a fashion student. Her line looked and felt expensive; it was as if her garments were pulled off Bergdorf Goodman. The delicate piping down the shoulders and arms contrasted against the masculinity of the jacket’s structure, proving Bird’s wide range in aesthetic and construction. While Bird lured the crowd in with her dynamic mixed construction of fitted and flowy, the movement in Al-Banna’s pieces had pizzazz. Bird’s collection won Most Marketable, and Al-Banna took Honorable Mention for Best Bridal Wear.

A model posed in one of designer Colton Gerard’s contemporary adaptations of military uniforms. Gerard’s collection, “Heritage,” won Best Collection at this year’s textiles and apparel fashion show.

Each designer also showcased formal and bridal attire, and Bird was awarded Best Evening Gown for her modern champagne-colored silk gown which featured golden piping that wrapped around the hips and extended to the floor.

One of the panelists and owner of Blackmail Boutique, Gail Chovan, said that she was impressed with how far the show had come since she originally started judging it 10 years ago.

“It is great to see guys that are designing for guys that use fashion-forward thinking and have strong technical skills,” Chovan said.
